

No cable necessary

The computer technology is so fascinating now. Excuse me, many of you may already know this, but there may be some out there like me who did catch on yet.

My husband and I were trying to cut back on our bills a few years ago so we could pay off some debts. About that time, we also moved. During the transition, we decided not to get cable TV for awhile. It was supposed to be a temporary decision.

Later, when it came time that we felt we could get cable again, we discussed it. To our surprise, we found that we didn't miss not watching TV. We rent DVD's when we wanted to watch a movie and otherwise, we didn't miss TV at all.

Not only did we not miss TV, but we gained more time to communicate about the day and to work on creative projects. This seemed to far outweigh what we would gain by going back to watching TV.

The only time we miss it is when there is a big news event or sporting event that would be nice to watch.

Recently, we almost got cable again because we rented the TV series call LOST and fell in love with the show. Then someone at work let me in on the secret. If you have a computer you can go to www.abc.com or www.nbc.com and actually watch an entire season of many different popular shows right on the computer at your own leisure. Who needs cable when you have a computer? You can take your lap top with you everywhere and practically watch anything you want to at no expense.
