

Question Are you able to pick the area that you would like to travel to and also are you able to take your husband along. I have heard that you have to share an apartment with another traveler? If this is the case a husband would be out of the question.

Absolutely, you are able to pick the place you want to go. That is the beauty of travel nursing. Usually there are opening just about anywhere you might want to go, but if there isn't one right now there will be one later. Meanwhile, you still get a great selection to choose from and can turn down any offer that doesn't sound good to you for any reason. There is much more autonomy and control over your life as a traveling nurse.

This new autonomy also includes you deciding who you want to travel with and what kind of housing you are willing to tolerate. If you want private housing, only accept assignments with companies that provide private housing. There are so many companies out there nowadays that you can find private housing without a problem.

Make sure you are up front about who will be traveling with you so they can help best accommodate your needs. All travelers have different needs when traveling away from home, it is up to them to at least try to make it as comfortable for you while you are away so you make money for them and yourself. Without you, the companies would be out of business.

Many travelers, travel with their families now. Our society is so much more mobile that it ever was. If you can travel with your husband, it would be a great adventure for both of you to try. It's a great way to keep things new and exciting.
